The European Training Foundation (ETF) is organising a seminar on active labour market policy approaches focused on gender equality and inclusiveness in the labour market.

In 2022, ETF launched a multiannual initiative with the aim of (i) capturing developments in areas of active labour market policies (ALMPs) and transition to work, in particular skills implications, and (ii) enhancing knowledge sharing on innovative policy solutions, particularly in employability and skills sets in a lifelong learning approach. The work includes reviews of activation, reskilling and upskilling policies and programmes; fostering policy learning and exchange among ETF partner countries and EU Member States, as well as regular collection and expansion of datasets on ALMPs and other related aspects.

ALMPs aim to improve the employability of specific target groups, such as the unemployed, young graduates, laid-off workers, long-term unemployed, elderly or people with obsolete skills, through the provision of different services and measures (for example training, employment and entrepreneurship incentives or subsidized employment):

- Gender inequality has proven to be a stubborn and damaging reality of the global labour market in detriment of women; no matter in which way we look at the labour statistics, women, constituting half of the world population, represent an untapped human potential.
- Vulnerable groups such as persons with disabilities, displaced people, young people in rural areas, or ethnic and migrant groups, and people facing intersectional inequalities, require specific activation measures to be included in the labour markets.

A tailored combination of ALMPs is needed to support the labour market entrance and retainment of women and of the most vulnerable groups with weak attachment to the labour market. ALMPs may remain blind regarding labour market specific challenges notwithstanding declared intentions of equality and inclusiveness, practitioners may be unarmed in front of multiple target groups and variety of challenges, and the Public Employment Services often lack the dedicated services to address the obstacles faced by women and by the most vulnerable groups, which in many cases were amplified by the pandemic.

The objective of the seminar is to stimulate common reflection and discussion on how active labour market policies and training systems can accompany individuals and companies cope with the challenges based on gender inequalities and specific vulnerabilities. By bringing together partners from different institutional settings and regions, the seminar aims also to co-create a wide knowledge-base of innovative practices and successful enabling factors.

The event is open to participants from ETF partner countries. It targets ministerial and public employment service's officials, with the aim at providing them with reference background and making space for policy learning through sharing experience and discussing new policy ideas. Participants will get acquainted with new developments at EU level, as well as experiences of the ETF partner countries and beyond, in reshaping training provision and active labour market policies to be gender transformative and address the needs of groups at risk of labour market disengagement.
